More particularly, the present invention relates to a method and apparatus for sorting a biological sample using flow cytometry. Recent advances in flow cytometry and microfluidics have provided the potential for performing biological assays, particularly immunoassays, in small sample volumes at a rapid rate, over extended periods of time, and in a high density format. It is well known that flow cytometers can be used to analyze and separate a number of different types of samples, and provide a wealth of information concerning the sample. These instruments include the ability to distinguish particles in a sample based on parameters such as light scatter and/or fluorescence. This ability can be used for numerous applications, such as analysis and sorting of cells or other particles of interest. In spite of recent advances in flow cytometry and microfluidics, there remains a need for improvements that increase the speed with which such assays can be performed and/or increase the sorting speed and/or the precision of the assay being performed.
