I read a lot of different stories, mostly fantasy and science fiction. I loved it, especially when I could escape into other worlds and other lives, but I wanted to tell my own story. But I was so caught up in the fantasy, I couldn't take it seriously. I liked the idea of the hero and the heroine just like in any story, but in real life there were more than two people involved. That's when I realized, it's not a metaphor for anything. It's how it really was. In the beginning my stories were just that, stories. I didn't have the confidence to try and sell a story to a publishing house, so I wrote them and sent them out. I've sold a few to other writers, but I didn't sell very many, at first. That's when I started writing music. I had a lot of difficulty writing a song just like that, but I wanted to have that inspirational story as well. So I had to find a way to make it believable, to make it honest. I did have the idea of having a couple on drugs, which I still believe. The problem with that was that it was a little too real. What happened in one life is not the same as what happened in another. It's only recently that I came to the conclusion that I can write a story as
