The nutritional composition of medium-chain triglycerides (MCTs) and the possible metabolic consequences of feeding peripartal ruminants with these fatty acids were evaluated in 15 experiments involving 537 ruminants, including both dairy cows and beef cattle. In addition, 4 experiments, which involved 24 Holstein cows and 80 beef cows, were conducted to evaluate the effects of increasing the percentage of dietary MCTs on plasma concentrations of ketone bodies, glucose, beta-hydroxybutyric acid (BHBA), and insulin. Rations containing 50, 70, or 90% of the daily dietary fat as MCTs had a greater percentage of unsaturated fatty acids and a lower percentage of saturated fatty acids than rations containing less MCTs. The percentages of unsaturated fatty acids in blood lipids were greater in dairy cows than in beef cows. Percentages of unsaturated fatty acids in blood lipids were not affected by increasing the percentage of dietary MCTs in rations fed to dairy cows. In ruminants fed 75 to 90% of the dietary fat as MCTs, the percentages of unsaturated fatty acids in blood lipids were lower when the percentage of MCT in the diet was increased. For ruminants fed 85% of the dietary fat 77a5ca646e
