The town is the capital of the Mthatha Local Municipality in the Eastern Cape. As of 2011, the town had a population of 28,266. The town is served by a railway station, a national road and a popular tourist attraction. Geography Greenleaf is situated in the Mthatha Local Municipality in the Eastern Cape Province of South Africa. It is situated on the south coast, some 50 kilometres east of Mthatha and about 100 kilometres east of Port Elizabeth. The town has an elevation of around above sea level. History The town was established as a planned British settlement in 1833 by the government in the Cape Colony. It was named after the then Secretary for Colonies, Sir John Greenleaf Wesley. A railway line was constructed in the early 1920s, reaching the town in 1929. The town was declared a municipality in 1994. Racial tensions between Africans and European farmers boiled over in the town in May 2013 when the news of the murder of a 57-year-old black farmer by a white farmer, allegedly for stealing his cattle, caused racial tension. The incident resulted in the arrest of 11 whites and one black man in connection with the murder. Economy The town has a very developed economy, partly due to the presence of British goods, the British Army, the Railway Company, the Beach Boys and a number of businesses, including banking, doctors, lawyers, insurance companies and a college. It is the regional commercial centre for Mthatha
