Polls show that the high value of the euro is the main reason behind the exodus. The situation in France seems to be turning into the same one the EU had in 2016. Italy, for instance, still has more than a million citizens in France. The last census before Brexit showed that 50,000 British citizens lived in Europe, about 30,000 in France and only 2000 in Italy. According to French media, about 20,000 have left already, and that is after the first year of Brexit. Two reasons are being pointed out: value of the euro and high taxes. The value of the euro has plummeted from more than 1.40 euros at the beginning of 2017 to 1.24 euros now. The relatively low value of the euro makes French exports less competitive on the international markets. Taxes are also higher in France compared to Great Britain. The French want to be competitive again, and have started to sell their property. The migrants come not just from France, but also from other EU countries. This time around, they're mostly French citizens who have made their homes in foreign countries such as Spain, Italy or Germany, but prefer to live in France because of its social welfare. This is not the first time that French households are experiencing an influx of migrants. During the 1970s, many Turkish families settled in France. Then there was a larger influx in the early 1980s, and especially the migrant workers from Eastern European countries joined the party. The total numbers are estimated to be somewhere around 12 million people living in France. The current biggest crisis regarding migration is in Germany, where Chancellor Angela Merkel is now having to deal with a situation similar to that of France. A total of 1.2 million migrants have already arrived since 2015. Angela Merkel is having a difficult time dealing with the increasing numbers of migrants entering Germany. (Photo by epa/victor jamnik) In 2015, it was estimated that between 600,000 and 800,000 migrants would
