Human-Antibody-Dose-Dependent Activation of Multiple Complement Pathways In Vivo Protects Against Microbial Bacteremia. Coagulopathy, likely resulting from systemic complement (C) activation, is a major cause of death in sepsis and septic shock. To dissect the contribution of different pathways of complement activation to protection from sepsis and to devise strategies that selectively target certain pathways, we performed human-antibody-dose-dependent activation of multiple C pathways in a model of experimental bacteremia in immunocompetent, nonhuman primates. In a previous study, we established that monoclonal antibodies against human C2 and C5 specifically activated each C pathway without interfering with the other pathways. Complement activity was tested in 18 immunocompetent, healthy adult rhesus macaques, 5 each in the high-dose and low-dose antibody treatment groups. Complement activity, reflected by concentrations of end-product C4d and terminal-C5b-9, was measured in vivo by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay. In the high-dose treatment group, multiple complement activation was obtained with 1 (C2), 2 (C2-C5), 3 (C2-C5-C6), and 6 (C2-C5-C6-C7) antibodies. In the low-dose treatment group, only 1 (C2-C5), 3 (C2-C5-C6), and 6 (C2-C5-C6-C7) antibodies were effective in complement activation. Both antibody doses protected against bacteremia in all animals. The concentration of C4d in the high-dose group was significantly higher than that in the low-dose group. Terminal-C5b-9 concentrations were significantly increased after the administration of C5-C7 antibodies. Multiple complement pathways could be activated in vivo in immunocompetent primates in a dose-dependent manner. Human monoclonal antibodies are effective in targeting individual C pathways for specific complement activation to prevent systemic C activation and protect from sepsis. These data support the pursuit of a novel therapeutic approach of targeting multiple complement pathways in sepsis. Q: Is there any risk if I don't apply the below patch? [The effect of 1-5 years of childhood social deprivation on blood pressure, body mass index and selected biomarkers]. The aim of this study was to establish the relationship between social deprivation and blood pressure, body mass index (BMI) and selected biochemical markers. The study comprised a total of 654 boys and girls who were brought up in families with a low socio-economic status (SES). The study was carried out in a group of children (6-14 years old), the sample comprised 214 children from families with a low SES. One-fifth of the children were born to parents with a high and another fifth of children were born to parents with a medium SES. The children were examined on the first day of each month during five years. After the end of the study, each participant received a form in which a total number of 17 questions was asked on a scale from 1 (not true at all) to 4 (unvaryingly true). On these questions the participants assessed themselves on a scale from 1 (not true at all) to 4 (strongly true) whether they felt lonely or were popular with peers, whether their parents were united or not, whether their parents had been separated or not, whether the child's happiness and satisfaction with the studies or other home conditions were satisfactory or not. Finally, they assessed themselves on a scale from 1 (not true at all) to 4 (strongly true) on whether the family rules were clear or confused, whether the father was physically or mentally strict or compliant, and finally whether the working conditions at home were easy or difficult. The level of social deprivation and its gradation was assessed at the end of the study, and the children's body mass index (BMI) and blood pressure levels were measured at the beginning of the study. The psychological and physiological test results were compared by means of mean values and comparison of mean values between two groups, and by means of ANOVA, Kruskal-Wallis test, χ^2 test and Spearman correlation analysis. The results of the study showed that children with higher levels of social deprivation were: more often female, lower in height and weight, significantly lower in blood pressure, more frequently unmarried, dissatisfied with the studies or other conditions at home, more frequently physically or mentally strict in the family, less often satisfied with their home conditions, were more frequently disappointed with their physical appearance, more frequently dissatisfied with their school or other educational conditions. In this study boys with high levels of social deprivation
