Note Technically, if you save a Photoshop file and then open it in another image-editing program, you don't create a new file; you're simply opening up a file that was previously saved. 2. From the Format drop-down menu, choose JPEG (recommended) or TIFF (for more flexibility). This step determines the quality of the exported file. JPEG is the most popular format for digital photographs—the default setting. TIFF, which supports multiple color spaces, is used by most desktop publishing applications. 3. Select the size of your image on your monitor. Some web browsers support the autosizing feature of the Save for Web dialog box (File→Save for Web), which zooms the whole image to the right or left size you specify. To get the best image quality without having to resize the image yourself in software, set the Width option and your monitor. As you get closer to the size you want, the image adjusts itself to be as small as possible. The feature is also known as _Image Resize_. 4. If you want to use a document format other than JPEG, choose an option from the JPEG Quality menu, as shown inFigure 5-10. You'll find a lot of different quality settings, but the higher the number, the smaller the file size but the poorer the quality. For web graphics, the quality isn't nearly as important as the file size, and JPEG-quality setting is just fine. The default image quality setting in most web browsers is usually quite good, because images used for web display often have to be quite small. If the image that you want to share isn't already small, you can resize it in the image-editing software. Figure 5-10. When you select a higher JPEG quality, you're sending a compressed file with a smaller file size. Normally, you'd use

Q: How to find the most commonly occurring item in a list of lists of dicts? I am making a game and I'd like to keep track of the most common icons that are displayed on a map to show players where they should go next. For example, if the player visits the following locations: In the top right-hand corner is a tree icon Next to the tree is an orange monkey icon The player also finds a blue penguin and a white bear How would I collect the most common/preferred/relevant icons? A: A good approach for this is to perform a list comprehension. For your example, if you wish to produce a list of the most frequently found images, you could do something like the following: import operator most_frequent = [{'image': count, 'frequence': freq} for count, freq in sorted((set(item['image'] for item in mapped_data), set(item['frequence'] for item in mapped_data)))] For this to work, I created an empty list mapped_data and then used a nested list comprehension to populate it with the results. The first part of the list comprehension produces a set from the image key, and the second part produces a set from the frequency key. Then we sort the two sets (using operator.itemgetter to group them by the source) and finally sort the two resulting lists in descending order (using sorted). To further dig
