Photoshop CS3 is the latest version of Photoshop. You can find out more about the differences between the two versions at In addition to Photoshop's toolbars, menus, and dialog boxes, you can find them in other areas. To access these in Photoshop, press the Escape key on your keyboard, and Photoshop takes you to the menus and toolbars. Photoshop uses layers in its editing system. To create a new layer, click its name in the Layers palette and then click the Create a New Layer icon (it looks like a paintbrush with a drop shadow) at the bottom of the Layers palette. Then type a new name for the layer, or click the Freeform text tool to draw the new layer's name in the layer dialog box. Most of the time, you don't want to create individual layers for each image, so you choose layer modes instead. This lets you manipulate an image on a single layer with multiple effects and layers. Layers and their modes are important to understand, because when you use the Layers palette or the Layers panel, that is what you are working with. To create a layer, choose Layers from the Layers palette menu and click the New Layer icon at the bottom of the palette. The New Layer dialog box opens, and you can simply type a layer name or click the Freeform text tool to choose a name that's not taken. The Options bar at the bottom of the New Layer dialog box is the best place to go for layer-specific information and options. You can always switch to a new layer without having to close out of your active image. In the Layers palette, click the Selection tab and, in the Layers panel, click the Show Selection icon on the right side. You see the selection handle at the bottom of the Layers panel. Drag the selection handle to place your cursor where you want to start creating a new layer. If you have ever used the Smart Photo Selector in Camera Raw or Lightroom, you've used Photoshop's Layer in a Smart Object feature. If you haven't, it is great! A Smart Object is a special layer, not a single layer, that you can edit by using features such as the Clone Stamp and Healing Brush, all using the pixels of the layer. You can view Smart Objects as layers, but they don't show up in the Layers palette
