Book my Show: my show :, a Kamasutra 3D (2014) movie by director Pankaj Jha Productions,.Q: How to handle unmappable exceptions in a parent class I am implementing a system of logging or'swallow' exceptions to the highest level of abstraction. You can think of this as handling an Exception for a BaseException class (this is a hybrid Java/C++ system) or like a Lua coroutine pattern (C++). When my base exception is thrown, a handler class is called. If an error occurs inside a method in my handler class, then it will call super(), which, in this case, throws an UnmappableException. However, I do not want to catch this, as it is a runtime error that should be logged. How can I do this? Is there a way to 'bubble' the exception to the appropriate handler or a property on my base exception that denotes that it is a runtime error? Thanks. A: An UnmappableException will be caught in the lowest level where a suitable handler can be found. It will be simply passed through the function call, over all the higher level functions until a handler is found. If one is not found, an exception will be thrown, with UnmappableException as the argument. For example, given the following handlers: public void f(Exception ex) { // Do stuff that is expected, and usual for all handlers } public void g(Exception ex) { f(ex); } public void h(Exception ex) { // Don't do anything with it, just pass it off // to the caller throw ex; } ...when an exception comes from an inner call f(ex) it will be trapped, and given to g, and passed on to the highest handler h. If you don't catch an exception at a handler level, you will never get one. Q: Saving a List in an SQLite Database I'm using a SQLite database to save information from a form in Android. I use the class SQLiteOpenHelper. I've done much of the work, the only problem I'm having at the moment is saving a List. In the form there is a String[] that is turned into a List using the
