Importing images Images can be brought into Photoshop in numerous ways. The most popular way, and the easiest, is to drag them into Photoshop from a browser. For example, if you are viewing a website with a photo of a woman that you'd like to use, you'd simply click the image and drag it into Photoshop. If you already have a file in your local computer's hard drive that you'd like to use, a popular method is to open your image in a separate window by opening the filename and pressing the Open button.

This places the image in your workspace window, just like when you drag an image from a web browser. The Import menu, located on the bottom of the screen, helps you to select an image that will be opened. It has many options and can be found by clicking on the small envelope symbol

Minimum Wage Increases Will Not Save Jobs, Job Creation, or Economic Growth A new report by the National Employment Law Project (NELP) highlights a growing problem with a mandatory minimum wage increase: an increase in job losses, especially in low-wage industries. The report, Jobs, Wages, and the Minimum Wage: Raising the Low-Wage Worker Pay Floor? finds that in states that have passed a state minimum wage increase since 2008, average hourly wage losses are near double the national average, indicating that employers are already passing the costs of the minimum wage increase to workers. The report, which was authored by NELP in collaboration with the Employment Policies Institute (EPI), also finds that, contrary to arguments from some advocates, the minimum wage does not seem to have an impact on overall employment levels. Despite calls by a number of states for increases to the federal minimum wage, the number of jobs gained has only been roughly one-third of the state average since the federal minimum wage was hiked in 2009. The report's analysis offers a possible explanation for why employers can avoid any increase in labor costs even in the face of dramatic increases in the minimum wage: The rapidly growing low-wage sector is the source of most of the jobs created during the past decade, indicating that it is primarily low-wage firms that are responsible for most of the job creation. "The growth in low-wage employment is larger than the growth in any other sector of the economy," said NELP Research Director Eileen Appelbaum. "State-level minimum wages do not appear to be crowding out private-sector job creation. Jobs are being added and laid off throughout the economy, though low-wage jobs are growing much faster than any other category." The report notes that the economic progress in recent years has been concentrated in the high-wage sector, which has benefited from rising consumer demand for new technology products and services. "Between 2006 and 2011, the United States job market actually shed roughly 900,000 jobs, almost entirely due to the decline in employment in the low-wage sector," the report notes. "A typical low-wage worker worker with a high school degree is losing $800 per year in earnings as a result of the decline in total national low-wage employment." States have raised minimum wages by an average of $4.06 per hour since 2008, placing a floor
