On Thursday, a jury in Santa Fe County, New Mexico, found a former city police officer not guilty of negligent homicide in the shooting death of an unarmed 17-year-old who said he was running from a traffic stop. During a monthlong trial in which the physical evidence contradicted several key points in the officers' narrative, the defendant officer argued that he was "robbed of his right to life." But on Friday, Judge Kristin B. Gonzalez chose not to sentence the officer, and instead sentenced him to probation and community service. The verdict, announced on the morning of the sentencing, is a victory for the plaintiff's family, which sued after the shooting in 2013, and indicates that the legal system appears to have found the officer's account of the events a little too farfetched to believe. The shooting is particularly troubling in the context of state and local law enforcement's treatment of those with mental illness — a background issue that will be present in virtually every fatal shooting of a mentally ill person. Between 2008 and 2012, more than 80 percent of the 1,099 people killed by law enforcement were victims of mental illness; of those people, nearly a third were shot and killed by police. There were a few people killed by police officers last year who had a psychiatric history — most of them who were not suffering from mental illness in the moment of their deaths. These are the incidents that have been well-documented and publicized. The incidents that result in a justified use of force still occur. This year, 18 mentally ill people were killed by law enforcement. And the figures go back farther. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has published a study of fatal law enforcement shootings of the mentally ill over 20 years, based on media reports. In the first
